Instagram Growth for a Handmade Brand

Instagram rewards consistency and process content far more than polished, salesy posts. For a handmade scrub business, the goal is simple: show the making, not just the finished jar.

What to actually post

- Reels of the pour — sugar into the bowl, oil streaming in, the stir that turns it glossy. These consistently outperform static photos for reach.
- Texture close-ups — a spoon lifting scrub out of the jar, slow motion if possible. This is what makes people want to touch (and buy) it.
- Before/after skin shots — a forearm before and after one use, softly lit, no filter. Keep claims honest ("visibly smoother," not medical claims).
- Behind-the-scenes stories — labeling, packaging orders, a peek at your workspace. This builds the personal-brand trust that makes strangers comfortable buying from an individual seller.

A simple weekly rhythm

Three posts a week is enough to build momentum without burning out: one reel showing the making process, one static product photo with pricing in the caption, and one story series showing orders being packed or a customer's photo (with permission). Consistency over a month matters far more than any single viral post.

Hashtags and captions

Use a small, consistent set of relevant hashtags (naturalskincare, handmadebeauty, sugarscrub, smallbusiness, plus your city name) rather than chasing broad, unrelated trending tags — local and niche tags bring in people who are actually likely to buy.

Facebook Local Groups: Selling Tips

Local "buy/sell/trade" and community groups are one of the highest-converting, lowest-cost channels available to a home-based scrub business — the audience is already local, which solves shipping and builds trust faster than a stranger online.

- Join groups for your town or neighborhood specifically, not just broad regional ones — hyper-local groups convert better and feel less spammy.
- Read each group's rules before posting; many only allow selling posts on certain days or in a pinned thread.
- Lead the post with one clear photo and a short line: what it is, the price, and how to order (comment, DM, or a simple link).
- Offer local pickup as an option — it removes shipping cost and friction and often closes the sale faster.
- Respond quickly to comments; local buyers often decide within minutes and move on if you're slow to reply.

Repeat posting, spaced out

Re-post every couple of weeks with a fresh photo or a new scent rather than the same post repeatedly — groups and their members change often enough that a fresh face on the same product keeps performing.

Craft Market Booth Setup

A market table has about two seconds to catch someone's eye from a walking pace. The goal of your setup is simple: make the product look irresistible from ten feet away, then make trying it effortless up close.

- Height and levels — use small crates or risers so jars sit at different heights; a flat table of identical jars reads as boring from a distance.
- Group by scent family — fruity, floral, gourmand as three visual clusters, so browsers can gravitate to what they already like.
- One open tester jar per category — with a small stack of wooden spoons or disposable applicators; letting people touch the texture is the single biggest driver of an in-person sale.
- Visible pricing — a small chalkboard or printed card; people are far less likely to ask (or buy) if they have to inquire about price.
- A card reader — walking away over a lack of cash is one of the most avoidable lost sales at a market.
- A simple email or SMS sign-up sheet — turns a one-time market visitor into someone you can reach for your next online restock.

Holiday Market Seasonal Strategy

Gourmand and spiced scents (see Chapter 5 of the main guide) see a real, predictable sales spike from October through the December gifting season — plan production and packaging around it rather than reacting late.

- Start batching in September — gingerbread, brown sugar caramel, and vanilla scrubs (Chapter 5) sell fastest once the weather turns; having stock ready before demand peaks avoids scrambling.
- Build a gift bundle — three seasonal jars in a small box with ribbon at a bundled price; gift bundles consistently sell better than single jars in November-December.
- Book holiday markets early — the best-trafficked craft fairs fill their vendor lists months ahead; reach out by late summer.
- Set a clear shipping cutoff date — and post it everywhere (bio, pinned post, captions) so online customers know exactly when to order for delivery by a certain date.

After the holidays

January is naturally slower — use it to restock fruity and floral scents for spring, rather than trying to force winter scents into a season that's already moved on.

5 Ready-to-Use Sales Script Templates

The same few questions come up again and again in DMs and comments. Having a warm, ready answer for each means you never leave a hot lead waiting while you figure out what to say.

Script 1 — "How much is it?"

Hi! Thanks for asking — jars start at $10 and go up to $15 depending on the scent and size. Is there a particular scent family you're drawn to (fruity, floral, or gourmand)? I can point you to a few favorites.

Script 2 — "Is it really natural?"

Yes — every jar is just sugar, coconut oil, and natural colorants and scents like fruit powders, dried flowers, or essential oils. No synthetic dyes, no microplastics. I'm happy to send the full ingredient list for any scent you're curious about.

Script 3 — "Can I customize the scent?"

Absolutely, within reason! I can adjust scent strength on most jars, and for orders of 3+ I can often do a custom blend. Let me know what you have in mind and I'll tell you if it's doable.

Script 4 — "Do you ship?"

Yes, I ship anywhere in the country — flat shipping is $X per order, or free local pickup if you're nearby. Orders usually go out within 2-3 business days.

Script 5 — "This would make a great gift — can you wrap it?"

It would! I offer a gift-wrap option with ribbon and a handwritten note for a small add-on — just let me know at checkout (or in your message) and I'll take care of the rest.

Phone Photography Tips for Product Photos

You do not need a camera, a lightbox, or editing software to get photos that sell. You need good light, a clean background, and a couple of angles repeated consistently.

Light

Shoot near a window with soft, indirect daylight — late morning or late afternoon is more flattering than the harsh light of midday. Never use a flash: it flattens texture and makes the scrub look plastic instead of tactile.

Background

Keep it simple and repeatable: a piece of light linen, a wood cutting board, or a plain light-colored countertop. A consistent background across every photo is what makes a feed or shop page look like a coherent brand instead of a pile of random shots.

Angles that sell

- Straight-on, eye-level — the jar as the hero, label facing forward and legible.
- 45-degree angle — shows the lid and label together; the most versatile all-purpose shot.
- Top-down flat lay — the open jar surrounded by a few raw ingredients (sugar, a flower, a lemon slice) tells the natural-ingredients story instantly.
- Texture macro — phone camera as close as it will focus on a spoonful of scrub; this is the shot that makes people want to touch it.

One extra tip

Wipe the outside of the jar and lid clean before every photo — smudges and fingerprints are the single most common thing that makes an otherwise good product photo look unpolished.
